February presentations successful

At gatherings of Fairway Village and Daughters of Washington Pioneers, Louise Tucker told why and how the booklet, "Battle Ground Lake Before It Became a State Park," was published. Several books were purchased.

1. Louise Tucker, club chairman of the Battle Ground Lake History committee and writer of the resulting book was asked by the activity chairman of the over 50 housing development, Fairway Village, to tell the residents why and how the lake's history book was published.

2. The presentation was also requested by the president of the Daughters of the Pioneers of Washington State. Club member Nancy Lee, left, answered questions and sold several copies of the book.

3. Louise (right) showing Judy Bergren, a "Daughter," the book.

Waste? Recycle?

On Jan. 11, Sammy Salgado, Waste Connections spokesperson, enthusiastically reviewed which specific items can be recycled and which cannot. Items that cannot be recycled end up in the landfill.

She stressed the importance of observing the safety rules set forth by the company. Human hands sort the items as travel down a long conveyor belt. Anything sharp is a hazard to the workers.

She encouraged customers to go on their website to seek answers to any questions if unsure about how to recycle certain items. If going online does not seem clear, call the Waste Connections office for clarification.

Members learn about elections from local LWV officer

Sharon Brown, president of the League of Women Voters Clark County, shared the mission of the group and the many ways in which citizens can receive information to be informed before an election.

The group is very active in promoting registrations and informing voters about candidates and issues.

Not all states offer the ease of voting and assurance of accuracy that Washington state's election process puts forth.

The group stages candidate forums, maintains detailed lists of candidates personalized to one's voting districts and provides contact information for anyone online by request.
